Formatted and unformatted input output in c in hindi

Subsections Input/output operations that we have dealt with so far were formatted — information was somehow interpreted: white space was ignored, numbers were converted to strings which only then were displayed or printed, etc. However, there are operations when what we want is to read or write just „raw bytes“, without interpreting them.

16.4.1 Unformatted input There are a few methods which can be invoked for an input stream object in order to read a portion of information in the form of bytes, without any translation. `istream& get(char& c)` — reads one byte and returns a reference to the stream, so it can be used in a cascade. The argument `c` is passed by reference and modified, so on return it contains the byte just read in (it can be any byte, also corresponding to a control character, white space or NUL character (`'\0'`)). If reading failed, `c` will be equal to a special value `EOF`, i.e., a byte which, on a given platform, denotes end of file (Ctrl-Z in Windows, Ctrl-D in Unix/Linux). After a failure, the state of the stream will be bad (more details will be given shortly). We can recognize if this is the case by comparing the value of a stream with `NULL` (or `0`). The value will be converted to type `void*` and `NULL` means that the stream is in a state of an error; any other value signals that the stream is „healthy“. Such a conversion is performed automatically in a context requiring a logical value. This means that this value may be used in conditional statements (`if`), and in loops `for`, `while` etc. For example, if `strin` is an input stream connected to a file, we can copy the file to the standard output by a simple loop: `char c; while (strin.get(c)) cout`
