Updated on July 6th, 2020 While there are a lot of potential topics a committee may want a student to cover in their scholarship essay, the "why I deserve this scholarship" prompt is one of the most common ones around. Ultimately, it seems simple at its core, but the "why I deserve this scholarship" topic can feel like the most complex question on the planet if your student needs to strike a balance in their tone, making sure they don't come off arrogant while also not selling themselves short. Additionally, they need to cater their response to their target audience, the scholarship committee. If your child isn't sure how to begin, here are some tips for writing a winning "why I deserve this scholarship" prompt because of self-doubt. Not everyone is comfortable tooting their own horn, and some even have trouble viewing their accomplishments as noteworthy, their experiences as valuable, and their perspective as unique. However, nearly every student has overcome an obstacle over the course of their life or had to persevere to reach a point of success. That means they do have something to share that can showcase why they deserve the scholarship. Before your child begins writing their "why I deserve this scholarship" essay, they need to have the right mindset. It's important for them to realize that they are worthy and to use that feeling to drive their writing. If your student needs a little help, consider sitting down with them and reflecting on their biggest achievements. Remember, the accomplishments don't have to be academic. Life experiences of all kinds can qualify, so don't be afraid to mention events that happened outside of the classroom. Consider the Source of the "Why I Deserve This Scholarship" Question When your child writes a scholarship essay, the scholarship committee is their target audience. After all, these are the people who select the winner, so catering the content to them can help your student force a stronger, more meaningful connection with the committee is their target audience. scholarship in mind. This allows them to choose the accomplishments that will genuinely speak to the reader. For example, a scholarship from a charity that focuses on giving back to the local community may appreciate hearing about running a side business or how they worked part-time while maintaining a high GPA. Organizations that focus on academics could connect with your student's work as a tutor or time spent participating in school clubs that align with the organization's values and goals. If they aren't sure how to find this information, the organization's "About Us" page on their mession and core values statements. Ultimately, taking a little time to research the organization before your child writes their "why I deserve this scholarship" essay can pay off big if it gives them the ability to forge a more meaningful connection with their audience. Use Examples, Not Trait Descriptions Scholarship essays with statements like, "I'm a hard worker," and other generalizations or platitudes. Sentences like that aren't particularly powerful and aren't almost guaranteed not to be convincing. However, a well thought out example has the potential to sway hearts and minds. In the vast majority of cases, people enjoy stories, so your student should tell theirs in their "why I deserve this scholarship" essay. Encourage them to take people on a journey instead of using clichés. It will be significantly more impactful, and can dramatically improve their odds of being selected. If you and your student are working on the scholarship process, make sure you can find more scholarships your student is actually eligible for and are legitimate. To create an effective scholarship essay, your child will need to look beyond simply getting their degree. For example, do they have a career in mind? Do they want to change the world in some way? Is there something their degree. For example, do they need to explain how the scholarship can enable them to get there. For example, giving them the ability to attend a school with a rigorous and respected program in a relevant field that would be a pertinent point. Similarly, if the scholarship allows them to access additional experience that would help them excel, such as a chance to participate in a non-paid internship instead of working a part-time job, that could also be worth discussing. The idea is to showcase that, by awarding your student. In the end, a scholarship is an investment made by an organization, so they want to know that it is money well spent.
